Essential Oils Market Dynamics

Drivers

Long shelf life as well as growing demand from personal care industry

Essential oil has a long shelf life because it does not oxidise or become rancid and does not degrade when subjected to high temperatures and pressure because of this property, it is used in a variety of skin care products, including moisturisers, facial cleansers, scar and stretch mark minimizers, and anti-acne gels, as well as hair care products, including conditioners, de-tangling creams, and hair regrowth serums.

The growing application in supplement and pharmaceutical industries

In addition, essential oil contains a variety of vitamins and minerals, including vitamin E and B complex, silicon, chromium, copper, iodine, and zinc. As a result, it is used as a diet supplement and as a key ingredient in several pharmaceutical products for the treatment of sores, cuts, bruises, burns, and athlete's foot and warts. Furthermore, as some plant seeds can be cultivated after five years, leading companies invest in R&D activities to develop innovative and cost-effective technologies to ensure a consistent supply of oil resources.

Opportunity

Increased disposable income and standard of living are the major factors driving the growth of the essential oil market; increased demand for personal care products drives the market rapidly. The variety of essential oil applications in personal care products is expanding rapidly, which is likely to create new opportunities for essential oil market manufacturers during the forecast period.

Restraints

However, the market's growth is expected to be hampered by a limited supply of raw materials and stringent quality standards. The consumption of natural reserves and the subsequent outcomes associated with some essential oils restrain market growth.
