Too many people think they can just rely on Social Security or their company's pension plan, but those sources of income are often not enough to cover all of your expenses in retirement. contributing enough to get the most out of your employer's matching program, if they offer one."

Anthony Pellegrino also had advice for how people can overcome some of the challenges they may face during retirement: "One of the biggest financial challenges people face in retirement is figuring out how to generate income from their investment portfolio. With traditional investing, you're relying on the stock market to provide you with the capital gains or dividends that can help supplement your Social Security or pension income. But in today's low-interest rate environment, that can be a challenge. That's why I focus on helping my clients build a retirement income plan that includes accounts with lifetime income features. This way, no matter what happens with the stock market, my clients will have a paycheck they can count on for life."
