Global Anthrax Treatment Market Dynamics

Market Definition

Anthrax is caused by a bacterium called Bacillus anthracis (B. anthracis). It is primarily a disease of livestock that become infected by ingesting spores found in soil. Humans usually become infected with anthrax by handling products of infected animals such as leather or wool or by inhaling anthrax spores from infected animal products. They can also become infected by eating undercooked meat from infected animals. Anthrax is not known to be spread person-to-person.

Three clinical forms of anthrax infection exist. Cutaneous anthrax is the most common, constituting over 95% of reported cases. An estimated 2000 cases of cutaneous anthrax occur worldwide annually and result from the entry of spores through skin abrasions.

The differential diagnosis of anthrax includes depending on the clinical features, relevant specimens include PCR, gram stain and cultures, from blood, pleural fluid, site of ulceration, cerebrospinal and stool. A number of available techniques are available. Most assays are based on detecting the entire organism, organism antigens, or organism nucleic acid through one of the following techniques: culture-based conventional methods; immunological detection; nucleic-acid-based assays; ligand-based detection; and biosensors.
