Suture is a linear stitching medical device used to stitch the wound; it basically stitches tissues particularly in surgeries or trauma and involves a needle with an attached length of thread. These are also used to close the surgical scar tissues. It is used in multiple diseases including neuropathic ulcers, pediatric pulmonary surgery, diabetic ulcers and skin ulcers to close the wound.

The surging incidents of surgical procedures are primarily responsible for driving the growth of the sutures market. Additionally, increasing geriatric or old aged population around the world and easy adoption of sutures because of the approval of FDA and CE marking also heighten the market's overall growth. However, the rising demand for the minimally invasive surgeries and availability of other wound care products is estimated to obstruct the market's growth. The regular technological developments and advancement are expected to generate profitable opportunities for the market. On the other hand, the unfavorable taxation policies have the potential to challenge the market's growth.
