LLC Laws by State vary by State- Companies can form an LLC in any State the choose

Like most business structures, LLCs or limited liability companies are governed and regulated by the individual states.

Business owners should know that some US states are comprehensive and progressive in their laws governing LLCs. On the other hand, some have laws and rules that seem to be last updated back in the 1990s.

The process of registering a limited liability company is different and varies considerably in every US state. In most cases, LLC registration forms are filed with the relevant state's secretary of state. They require basic information like business address and name, the business's name, and information pertaining to any potential co-owners.

Some states are more suited for LLC formation. For example, fewer tax requirements and simple paperwork make Wyoming an ideal state to form an LLC. Also, this state has one of the lowest rates of sales tax in the country. Similarly, if business forms an LLC in American Samoa, it will benefit from limited liability protection, a versatile management structure, and tax flexibility.

There are many rules and laws that are standard and apply to all LLCs in the US regardless of the specific state in which they are formed:

LLCs just require a single member in order to get started, allowing them to start without first creating a board of directors.

While it is often best to form an LLC in the US state where a business is located or owners reside, there can be circumstances and situations where it is better to form a LLC in a different state.

Creating and maintaining an LLC, especially in American Samoa, requires considerably less paperwork compared to forming a corporation.

Articles of organization are usually required to form an LLC.

Any LLC that intends to hire employees is required to obtain an Employer Identification Number (EIN) or a federal tax ID number from the IRS. The disparity in LLC law and rules from one state to another is not necessarily a drawback.

However, it means that businesses have to be prepared for it every step of the way. This will ensure that businesses do not inadvertently structure a limited liability company in a way that hurts the future growth of the company.
