The Coronavirus, or COVID-19, has wreaked havoc on the world for the past two years and counting. As it spread around the world, this highly contagious disease disrupted daily life with ruthlessness rarely seen. The general public had to endure restrictions on the general movement of people, goods, and services, as well as complete chaos in terms of trade. COVID-19 did a number on the global economy!

Not to mention that viruses are supposed or forced to mutate. A number of corresponding strain variants appeared sequentially, but infrequently. From Alpha to Delta, Omicron to Deltacron, the last two years have taken many by surprise. The emergence of these variants has added to the bleakness that most markets have been left to face. The consequences of this pandemic and its offshoots are expected to have a long-term impact on how industries behave in the future.
