The global elastomer infusion pump market size was valued at $534 million in 2018, and is projected to reach $745 million by 2026, growing at a CAGR of 4.2% from 2019 to 2026. Elastomer infusion pumps are disposable medical devices that are used for administration of intravenous (IV) drugs such as antibiotics, analgesics, chemotherapy, and other medications. These devices use energy in an elastic membrane (inside the pump) to provide the force for drug delivery. In addition, it provides advantages over conventional electronic pumps in features such as portability, feasibility, and lesser scope for human errors. However, pump failure can have a significant impact on patient safety, making it required for pumps to be operated by a trained professional. The two major types of elastomer infusion pumps are continuous rate pumps, and variable rate pumps.
