Linear motion systems refer to automatic devices designed to move in one direction. They consist of a drive that helps move the load, a guide system for handling the load, and sealing to protect the internal parts of the system. Depending on the mechanism, they can be non-motorized or motorized and are commonly available in single-axis and multi-axis variants. They are used in various machines, technical platforms, and other operations, such as printing, scanning, and food processing. Since they provide high accuracy, performance, and speed in harsh environmental conditions, linear motion systems are extensively utilized to transport industrial payloads efficiently.
