One of the primary goals of Project We Care is to help local veterans turn their houses into places of sanctuary. In her interview, Erin Smith talks about the inspiration for Project We Care and what its mission is, where the name came from, what types of items and goods Project We Care collects, some of the most pressing needs it faces currently, and how their charitable work has benefited the community of Weston. When asked about the long term vision for Project We Care, Erin Smith said:

"Our goal with this organization is to be able to help as many people as possible. Whether it's helping us expand our volunteer base and outreach efforts, or inspiring others to donate items that we can then distribute throughout local organizations and veteran families, we want to continue expanding. I've always said: you don't know what someone else is going through until you walk a mile in their shoes; and taking even small steps towards helping those in need gives us all an opportunity to take a little of their burden off them so they have more energy for themselves."

Erin Smith talked about the role of local business in the Weston, Florida area as well as the many individuals who have helped out as volunteers or donors. She explained some of the ways that people can offer assistance:

“There are two ways to participate in Project We Care. The first way is by donating money or goods – whether it’s food, clothing, furniture or household items. The second way is to volunteer at one of our donation stations. Volunteers are needed year round! It doesn’t have to be anything overly time consuming; you could simply sort donated clothing into categories that we then distribute throughout local organizations for free or even prepare grocery bags that will go directly to a veteran. If people are feeling particularly entrepreneurial they could even consider organizing a fundraiser of some kind where they ask friends and family for donations for Project We Care!”
