The cationic starch global market consists of the sales of cationic starch by entities (organizations, partnerships, and sole proprietors) that refer to a type of modified starch produced by combining a reactive chemical with a slurry of partly swelled starch granules. They are used as wet end additives, rheology modifiers, paper binders, thickening agents, flocculants, emulsion stabilizers, and coating agents. Cationic starch aims to enhance tear strength, help bind particles together on the base material, and increase fiber and filler retention.

Global Cationic Starch Market Trends

Technological innovation is a key trend gaining popularity in the cationic starch market. Major companies operating in the cationic starch market are focused on providing advanced solutions to meet end-customer demands and strengthen their market position. These companies are implementing innovations into their end products, such as cross-linked starch products, high-charge cationic starches, anionic starches, and others, to provide additional value to the products. For instance, in June 2021, Roquette, an Indian pharmaceutical excipient provider, launched a new type of modified starch called STABILYS®. This aids in producing new types of paper known as EVO 880, which has a high latex replacement rate. It also contributes to lowering paper production costs for paper production industries.
