Safety leadership involves enforcing safety procedures by a designated leader within a workplace or an organization. Because they value safety in the workplace, safety leaders model appropriate workplace behavior for others to follow. Safety leaders advise employees on safety precautions while developing solutions for safety problems. An organization can have multiple safety leaders, and many have an official job that they work simultaneously with safety work.

"Safety leadership is essential. It allows organizations to assess their current safety policies while ensuring that employees work according to established safety procedures." Said Jenny Moraga, owner of LaborMax Staffing in Des Moines. "Cultivating a safe workplace with limited safety issues requires safety leaders to motivate employees to be mindful of their actions."

LaborMax Staffing iterated a few things to promote safety leadership within an organization. One way was by identifying and establishing safety leaders in the workplace. Designating safety leaders ensures that employees have someone reliable to assist them if a safety problem occurs. Another item LaborMax Staffing mentioned was regular safety training is a powerful way to reinforce safety practices and procedures.

One can even simulate hypothetical safety scenarios, while updating safety procedures promptly after employees report any safety issues. Industry guidelines do change, and it is vital that organizations maintain clear communication with employees to inform them of any updated safety policies. As a leader, one should feel assured in communicating with employees to ensure that they take safety seriously. If someone is not in a leadership role, a manager can periodically remind the team of safety leader's position, so the team is receptive to what is being stated.
