Dextrin is a colorless, gummy, low molecular carbohydrate that is odorless and tasteless. It is formed as a result of hydrolysis of either starch or glycogen. Dextrin used in food is mostly made from non-wheat sources, like tapioca, rice, or potatoes. In these cases, dextrin can be available with absolutely gluten free. Dextrin is majorly used in the food industry. It is not directly used but as a substance needed in the processing and finishing of food. Other uses include using it as a stiffening agent in the textile industry, as an adhesive in glues and as a binding agent in the pharmaceutical industry. Growing number of food small and medium sized manufacturing units and increasing use of dextrin is expected to garner the growth of the product market during the forecast period.
