As demand for new drugs and medicines grows, pharmaceutical companies are continuously looking for new ways to increase productivity, leading to an increased reliance on automated equipment and robotics. These changes in ways of working are revolutionising many areas of the industry. Current systems have dramatically increased the capability and flexibility of robots and experts are now predicting that they could soon be pivotal to pharmaceutical companies in their ability to reduce costs and increase overall efficiency. The use of robots in the pharmaceutical industry has many advantages when it comes to speed. Robots can perform tasks around three or four times faster than humans can and additionally can be used 24 hours a day. Such qualities make them excellent at producing large quantities of a product in a short space of time. Robots are also able to move to a precision smaller than a sheet of paper, which far exceeds the accuracy that any human could provide. To date, robots have been successfully used by Merck on bottling lines to place dispenser caps onto bottled allergy medications.
