

Business Reporter: Futureproofing RPA deployments

How to find the automation platform matching your business needs in the long run

LONDON, UNITED KINGDOM, September 18, 2022 /EINPresswire.com/ -- In an article published on Business Reporter, Blueprint Software talks about what businesses should consider when migrating their original RPA platform onto a new automation tool. The findings of a recent survey show that three quarters of the companies still using their original RPA tool are now in the process of switching to a new platform. The reasons for this vary from decreasing operating costs to making automation accessible for the average business user to automating complete business processes rather than just disparate stages of workflows. Migrating existing tools to a new automation execution platform, however, can be challenging – especially when done manually – and can lead to errors, lost productivity and higher maintenance costs.

Businesses when making up their minds about which automation platform to move to often fail to think strategically and only consider how different solutions will meet their current objectives. What they lack is a vision and an anticipation of how RPA, a method designed to automate routine, repetitive tasks will be increasingly superseded by the intelligent automation of decision-based end-to-end processes. As enterprise architectures are complex and diverse, it's equally important to ensure that the chosen automation provider integrates seamlessly with the business's tech infrastructure and incompatibilities don't stand in the way of automating as many processes as possible.
