“We've been making high quality blankets for Americans right here in the USA since 1865, and for our military since WWI. These are the very blankets we're donating to organizations serving some of the estimated 4.2 million youth and young adults experiencing homelessness in America,” says Faribault Mill President & CEO Ross

Widmoyer. “Providing a high-quality, long-lasting woolen blanket to children will bring them warmth, security, and comfort.”

Wool is made of natural fibers, is durable, odor and stain resistant, and stays warm when it gets wet. It's renewable, recyclable, and biodegradable. Wool is active, reacting to changes in body temperature to keep a body warm when it's cold but releasing heat and moisture when the body is hot. The many benefits of this fabric make it ideal for serving those in need.

“Donating these blankets aligns with our mission as a company and as parents to give back to the community in a meaningful way,” Widmoyer adds. “Our employees are proud to work for a company committed to community service and to provide a constant pipeline of warm blankets for these nonprofits for years to come.”

The organizations initially partnering with Faribault Mill who will distribute the blankets to those in need are the following:

- Anchorage – Covenant House
- Boston – Bridge Over Troubled Waters
- Chicago – Ignite
- Dallas – After8toEducate
- Denver – Urban Peak
- Los Angeles – Youth Emerging Stronger
- Minneapolis – YouthLink
- New York City – Covenant House
- Oakland – Covenant House
- Portland, Maine – Preble Street Teen Services
- San Francisco – Larkin Street Youth Services
- Seattle – YouthCare
- Washington, D.C. – Covenant House
