These protest measures have spread across Kurdish cities checkered in the three provinces of Kurdistan, West Azerbaijan, and Kermanshah in western Iran.

On Saturday, anti-regime protests erupted in Saqqez, Amini's hometown, as mourners gathered for her funeral. similar protests began in Sanandaj, chanting anti-regime slogans.in Tehran, Mahabad, and Karaj for the horrendous killing of Mahsa Amini.

This general strike follows the regime's severe crackdown on peaceful protests by locals in Sanandaj on Sunday night.

Many people in the capital of Iran's Kurdistan province took to the streets chanting various anti-regime slogans, such as "Death to Khamenei!" referring to regime Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei. Other slogans included "Death to the dictator!" and "No fear! We're all together!"

Locals in Sanandaj were braving all odds and standing up to the regime's dispatching of numerous security forces. Anti-riot units opened fire on the protesters who were describing Khamenei as a "disgrace".

Local activists have been reporting that dozens of protesters were injured as the regime's forces opened fire. Some reports claim four severely injured protesters were transferred to Tabriz in northwest Iran to receive medical treatment.

Activists have been posting reports online indicating the regime has dispatched Revolutionary Guards (IRGC) units to quell the protests and many of the units were dispatched from other provinces as they could not understand the locals when they spoke Kurdish.

Further reports indicate that Iranian regime authorities have been dispatching additional security forces and anti-riot units from Khuzestan province to Kurdistan fearing the protests will continue to expand.

On Monday, students of several universities in Tehran joined the nationwide protests over the killing of Mahsa Amini.

On Monday morning, as coordinated by locals, shop owners in the cities of Sanandaj, Saqqez, Bukan, Marivan, Mahabad, and others launched a general strike to continue voicing their protests over Mahsa Amini's brutal killing.
