Matt Kiefer, who has over two decades of experience working in the collections industry, is well-suited to be in a position of knowledge to help others with common financial mistakes that people make. Kiefer stated that he was pleased with the turnout both in-person and online. "I think we had every age demographic with us, and I was pleased at the questions especially from the younger generations who have missed out on being taught financial literacy in school," Kiefer said. He also had prepared two full resource pages with links for people to take with them to learn more including the financial literacy website, www.knowMyDebt.com, which is a free public resource put together by the American Collectors Association International (www.acainternational.org) of which Kiefer is a member.

Kiefer added, "ACA International is a great resource for those in the credit and collections industry and they truly care about doing the right thing and helping people and for them to put together a free website educating the public on financial literacy speaks volumes as to the association's integrity. So many negative things are said about the ARM industry and collection agencies in general, it truly feels great to be able to give back."

Ariana Ternary, another in attendance said, "It was a great presentation. Even the young people were engaged." Ailaine Cruz added, "Matt covered a lot of topics in a short amount of time. I now realize the mistakes I have been making and what I need to do from now on to correct them."
