One thing all speakers agreed on is that racism and other forms of discrimination breed violence and make peace impossible. They also believe the focus must be on our youth: To educate them and provide needed services so they can better themselves and create a positive future for themselves and their communities.

Sheoni Givens, President of the C.O.R.E. Syndicate, believes in working together to create greater impact. "Peace comes at a price," she said. "The price of your time, your commitment, and your passion."

In her presentation, Alisha Ogden, Multicultural Coordinator of Missouri Parents Act, described services available to assist families whose children may otherwise be marginalized because of disabilities.

Rev. Melvin Fernandez of World Harvest Ministries said, "Children are our decision-makers and shot-callers. Let's teach them right."

Everyone was on board about finding ways to help educate and encourage more inclusion and responsibility.

“Unless people understand their rights and the importance of standing up for the rights of others, we will continue to have strife and war,” said Emma Sims, social reform officer of the Church of Scientology Kansas City. “We can each start by applying these rights to others, in our families, neighborhoods, and everywhere. And by making sure people understand these rights, we can support peace and work toward ending all forms of discrimination.”
