Spring steel is a term used to describe various types of steel used in the production of blades, coils, antenna, vehicle and aircraft parts. It is an alloy of iron, carbon, manganese and is differentiated into three types, namely, low-alloy, medium carbon and high carbon. The product is manufactured by two processes. The work hardening process is used to manufacture in the form of sheets and rods. The heat hardening process produces it in the form of flat strips. The heat hardening treatment optimizes the properties of the product. The product is widely used in the transportation industry, the food and catering sector as well as defence. Its usage is preferred for suspension mechanisms in land transport vehicles as well as the landing gear of aircrafts owing to its impact resistant properties.
