What makes Highland Honey stand out is its dedication to raising and producing high-quality and handcrafted honey with excellent flavors of the place. The company understands that honey's quality partially depends on the unique interaction of geology, geography, and climate and how these characteristics affect plant life. Furthermore, the nectars and pollen from local plants, which Boulder County bees obtain in abundance, are food sources for the bees. With these unique qualities of the region and the skills of the beekeepers, Highland Honey creates unique and artisanal honey that customers enjoy.

The company also pays attention to the health and well-being of the bees. It introduces various foods that meet their nutritional needs and sustains bee health. It also supports the labor-intensive practice of frequently moving its hives following nectar flows. Because of the company's excellent approach to keeping bees and other elements in the region that support them, the bees are much healthier, allowing them to collect more nectars and produce excess honey for themselves as well as for sale.

The raw honey from Highland Honey is combined with diverse nectars from the varying eco-zones solely from Boulder County, producing a rich, complex flavor. Unlike other types of honey found on the market that are destroyed by heat to expedite jarring, Highland Honey produced in Boulder County, Colorado apiaries is raw, unheated, and creamed, so it will never further crystallize. The company creams the honey to maintain honey texture and enhance shelf life. People also prefer creamed honey because it is rich in taste and texture and much healthier to consume. Those seeking relief from illnesses by consuming honey can benefit significantly from raw or classic creamed honey.

"As a company, we aim to offer unique honey that customers will love and benefit from. When they taste our handcrafted honey, they will experience the unique tastes and floral aromas of Boulder County," the company's rep stated.
