Antibacterial glass is a thin, reflective surface that is either designed by infusing silver ions on the surface or coating the glass with other antibacterial agents, such as copper, zinc and titanium. It assists in preventing the spread of bacteria and fungi on the glass surface. Therefore, it is widely utilized in spaces, such as bathrooms and laboratories, that require a high level of hygiene and sterile environment. Apart from this, it is used in the healthcare industry to construct isolation rooms, hematology departments, oncology and geriatric units, burns units, maternity wards, and infirmaries.

Market Trends:

The increasing number of hospital-acquired infections (HAI), along with the rising technological advancements in the healthcare industry, represents one of the major factors fueling the global antibacterial glass market growth. Antibacterial glass is also extensively utilized in the food and beverage (F&B) industry for manufacturing glass containers that aid in preserving food products. Moreover, it finds applications in the manufacturing of consumer electronics, such as tablets and smartphones. The boosting sales of these products around the world, therefore, are driving the market for antibacterial glass toward growth. Other than this, it is finding applications in swimming pools, health spas and sports centers, which are prone to bacterial and fungal development. Furthermore, rising awareness about hygiene among individuals, coupled with increasing disposable incomes, represents another growth-inducing factor that is projected to strengthen the market growth in the coming years.
