The Inflation Reduction Act signed into law in August extends subsidies for millions of Americans who buy the Affordable Care Act. This includes individuals and families with group health insurance in Houston who were previously uninsured or underinsured. Now that it has been signed into law, several studies suggest an estimated 13 million people will continue to save an average of $800 per year on their Marketplace health insurance. Naturally, health insurance companies have also launched expansions into new markets, pushing the total to 16 by the end of next year.

Rick Thornton, a Houston health insurance agent, echoed a comment from Lisa Lough, president of Cigna's Individual and Family Plans, who was quoted in a recent article on this matter as saying, "By continuing to expand and enhance our individual and family plans, more people will have access to quality, affordable care that supports whole-person health." Thornton said more health insurance companies are expected to follow suit, and as this happens, their expansions should continue to reduce the ranks of the uninsured across the globe — providing unprecedented access to affordable healthcare.
