Computerised-aided manufacturing or modelling (CAM) is a technology that involves the use of software to control and direct the machine tools in the process of manufacturing. Computerised-aided design (CAD) is a computerised system that is used for designing, modifying and analysing the designing activities. Thus, CAD/CAM systems when applied to dentistry means all the functions right from the designing to the manufacturing of implants is are technologically handled saving a lot of time. Dentists are able to conclude the procedure effectively as they don't require regular adjusting of teeth and gums using this technology. In simpler words, the technology is a part of digital dentistry, wherein a ready tooth is scanned, designed, modified and manufactured for the purpose of insertion.

A rise in the demand for cosmetic surgeries is likely to drive the growth in the demand for CAD/CAM systems. Also, rising geriatric population would lead to the creation of more lucrative opportunities for the CAD/CAM systems market. Growing awareness about the dental health problems coupled with the increasing investment to improve the CAD/CAM systems technology has further widened the scope for growth.

However, high cost involved in getting this service from the dentist may prove to be a market growth restraint. Also, lack of skilled professionals and low level of knowledge on how to operate the CAD/CAM systems will further dampen down the market growth. Lack of effective reimbursement scenario in the dental and cosmetic surgeries will also prove to be an obstruction for the expansion of the market.
