Join the conversation

The UK is currently open to conversations about race, and the experience of minorities. TBNUK will shed a wholesome light on culture, family, health, and more across Britain's past, present, and future. Join the dialogue as we experience intimate conversations inside people's homes and workplaces.

Episode one will take a look at growing up black and British, and the differences in family culture.

Episode two will focus on church and tradition – a key influence in black culture over the years. Guests explore the relationships between church-goers and leaders, and take a look at women in leadership.

Episode three will look at health and well-being, as well as the important and highly discussed topic: education. The education and justice system for ethnic minorities has been a point of dispute for many years. We'll hear from those who have seen the system change over the decades, as well as hear their personal first-hand experiences.

Episode four will enter the world of music! Guests will shine a light on the entertainment industry and how it has evolved within the black British community.

Host Sharlene says: "I love stories, and I love people. In this four-part documentary, I want you to go on a journey with me, hearing and experiencing stories past, present, and future from the various people who have at least these three things in common: they have a faith in Jesus, they are based in Britain, plus they have a high concentration of melanin!"
