The world is in a really difficult place right now, with too much war and disagreement throughout our lands. Written by Bonnie Daffoe from Sweden, PS the Rebels from Kenya and produced by Shahed Mohseni, artists from 12 countries joined as one on stage to communicate peace through a song called "Bring the Love". It is a message from ICMA to the people who are standing on the wrong side of the history: "put down your weapons, think twice, you cannot rewind the time. serve the humanity".

A replay of the "Bring the Love" by ICMA is available to watch on YouTube; subscribe to the organization's official Youtube channel to receive notifications.

InterContinental Music Awards is a Los Angeles-based music competition and concerts that annually rewards and recognizes musical talent worldwide. The Awards continental approach offers musicians around the world a chance to be seen and rewarded for their artistic efforts regardless of their location, gender, ethnicity, nationality, color or race. Shahed began the live concerts over a decade ago to unite international musicians in Mediterranean where he attended Eastern Mediterranean University. He eventually moved to Los Angeles to expand the activity. He explained, "The world of today's suffers from discrimination, oppression, violence, and war. Most of these conflicts are the direct outcome of lack of knowledge of human in the understanding of one another. If the human being understood and accepted each other as who they truly are, it would be much easier to conclude to the fact that all people have the same right to live, enjoy the life with equal opportunities."

ICMAs has recognized many artists and crew from more than 45 nationalities from East-Asia to Mediterranean Rim, Europe, Africa and America. On Feb 2019, Music Connection Magazine said this about the ICMAs: "A music award without borders, a music award that unites all continents, a music award dedicated to all artists."
