Approximately two hours south of Calgary, in Southern Alberta, Waterton is home to some of North America's most picturesque peaks, alpine meadows, and sparkling lakes.

There are several reasons to visit Waterton National Park, from its local population of massive predators (including grizzly bears and cougars!) to its rich Indigenous history.

The variety of wildflowers that adorn the varied topography of Waterton, many of which are unique to the area, is one of the park's greatest strengths.

In actuality, there are more than 1,000 vascular plant species in Waterton. Throughout the year, wildflowers can be seen at various heights. Early spring (April through June) is the most fantastic time to see them in bloom as they emerge along roadsides, meadows, and footpaths. If an Anthophilous and can't miss the chance to see the flowers of Waterton, why not eat at the finest cafe here? Red Rock Cafe is open all year to serve people when they visit Waterton.

In addition to being the largest glacial trough lake in Canada, Upper Waterton Lake is also the deepest lake in the Canadian Rockies, measuring 148 meters at its deepest point. It also has a fascinating history.

Indigenous people have a long history at Waterton National Park; there is proof that they have lived there for over 10,000 years. They needed water for recreation, transportation, and nutrition. Upper Waterton Lake was named "Old Women Lake" by the Ktunaxa Nation because of its solitude and white caps that resembled grey hair.

The glacial lake supports numerous rare wildlife habitats, protects threatened and endangered species, and promotes outdoor leisure for humans.

Learning about Waterton's past is enlightening since the account of how it became the national treasure it is now is one of adventure and deft diplomacy. If interested in history and want to explore the beauty and history of Waterton, don't miss the chance to try out the dinner and drinks at Red Rock Cafe. The complete menu is available on the website, designed by ACE SEO, a Calgary SEO company.
