Returning to the Workplace in a Time of Economic Uncertainty

According to a report by Adaptavist, Australia has a higher percentage of hybrid workers (at 34%) compared with the respondents from the US, UK and Canada (at 29%). The report also states that 55% of Australians are more inclined towards hybrid work arrangements than their international peers (43%). Furthermore, 40% of Australian workers are concerned about the additional costs of returning to the office. The data analysis in the report also suggests the price of fuel, public transport, and road tolls are considerations that led to a preference for hybrid work-home arrangements. Not to mention, the uneasiness brought about by the current economic climate. With ever rising inflation rates and corresponding bank rates — which have a direct impact on business overheads — a flexible work arrangement is more than welcomed by many Australians.
