NEW YORK CITY, NEW YORK, UNITED STATES, November 2, 2022

/EINPresswire.com/ -- Edible packaging can be used to wrap or coat food or drugs. It can be eaten together or taken out before consumption. Packaging material must adhere to safe-food ingredients and be Generally Recognized As Safe status (GRAS), as required by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA). It is often made from biomass (plants and animals) and is therefore biodegradable.

Film-forming material, plasticizers and additives are the main components of edible packaging. To make edible films, you need a solvent. For this reason water and alcohol (or aqueous alcohol) are used. Primary film-forming materials include proteins, polysaccharides and lipids. Plasticizers and other functional additives such as vitamins, antioxidants, antimicrobial agents and essential oils, pigments, or chemical preservatives are also used to improve the protection properties of edible packaging.

To avoid packaging failure, edible packaging is evaluated using measurable quality parameters. The key factors to be evaluated are its moisture and gas barrier characteristics, microbiological stability and moisture adsorption capability, adhesion and cohesion and transparency. Most edible packaging material doesn't alter the product's appearance, taste, or smell. Recent innovations have allowed the product to contain aroma volatiles, vitamins, or flavoring agents.
