NEW YORK CITY, NEW YORK, UNITED STATES, November 2, 2022

/EINPresswire.com/ -- Dental schools have adopted digital teaching platforms that incorporate simulation technologies with haptic responses and Augmented Reality. These allowed students to be quarantined and instructors to provide safe remote teaching facilities. During the initial phases of the pandemic, however, there was a restriction on the supply chain for dental simulator hardware. This had a significant impact on the businesses of large players. Dental simulators are increasingly being used in dentistry schools for their wide range of uses in areas such as endodontics and prosthodontics. Students can improve their skills by using dental simulators.

You can also record, store and review the data with feedback options, which allows for self-training. Dental simulators also reduce the cost of dental schools purchasing cadavers. This makes it easier for students to use the simulators for their training. To maintain their competitive edge, key players in the industry have implemented various strategic initiatives such as acquisitions and mergers, partnerships, hardware & software launches, and other strategies. Dentsply Sirona, for example, announced in January 2022 that it had partnered with the University of Toulouse in France to bring its simulation units into preclinical laboratories. Companies are also launching new products that facilitate dental simulation training. In August 2019, HRV Simulation used VR headsets and haptic feedback technology to create a more realistic environment for dental students.
