factors fueling the growth of the global phospholipids market. The fundamental elements of membranes are phospholipids. The gut lining, a single-cell thick, semipermeable membrane that lets nutrients into the circulation while keeping waste in the colon, is one of the most significant membranes in the body.

Phosphatidylcholine supplementation has been shown in studies to improve the gut-brain connection by repairing gut lining, promoting a healthy inflammatory response, and even regulating the microbiome. Around 90% of the phospholipids in intestinal mucus, which is essential for defending the gut barrier against pathogens such harmful microorganisms and viruses, are made up of phosphatidylcholine.

This phosphatidylcholine content was shown to be reduced by 70% in ulcerative colitis patients, suggesting that low phosphatidylcholine may be a significant contributing factor in Inflammatory Bowel Disease (IBD). When ulcerative colitis patients received an oral, delayed-release phosphatidylcholine preparation to replace their losing mucus phosphatidylcholine, the inflammation subsided and eventually went away after a three-month therapy period. Growing consumer preference for organic and sustainable ingredients is anticipated to accelerate market revenue growth between 2021 and 2028.
