Potash is made up of numerous salts that are mined and made, some of which contain water-soluble potassium. The term "potash," that refers to plant ashes soaked in water in a pot. Typically, potassium chloride (KCl), sodium chloride (NaCl), as well as several other salts and clays, are abundant in its ores.

The main chemical involved in the reaction is potassium carbonate, which is produced by dissolving the soluble parts of the ashes in large iron pots. Potash is produced when the solution evaporates using a percolation process.
