Masters previously served as an administrator with USDA FSIS and has served on PFSE's Board since 2020.

The PFSE Board of Directors represents active food safety experts that ensure the organization's success in serving 13,000 community-based health, nutrition and food safety educators across the nation with educational resources. These educators reach about 8.5 million people in the United States with important safe food handling information that reduces the risk of food poisoning.

Together, alongside this dynamic Board of Directors, PFSE will continue helping families and individuals stay healthy by raising awareness of safe food handling practices and proper hand hygiene that reduce the risk of foodborne illnesses.
