Globalrelease Distribution service for Japanese SMEs

Increasing numbers of Japanese companies are making efforts to develop international business. This comes on the back of a lacklustre domestic economy that grew just 0.3% in the last quarter, and a market that, in population terms, is shrinking year on year and is forecast to decline from 126 million today to 107 million by 2050. The Japanese market has been fairly successful in the past, but the declining birthrate despite the government's encouragement of marriage among its citizens is still not enough for them to repopulate the country.

□Time to set this aside and be able to move forward the Japanese Companies must begin expanding overseas if they want to continue to survive this great threat. a Japanese Advertising Agent, Mr Chiba said "As global market grows, whereas domestic market stagnates, and small and medium enterprises (SMEs) as well as large firms are also expanding abroad. we have seen a steep upsurge in the number of enquiries from Japanese companies seeking help with overseas expansion. "

some Japanese companies have unique products and service offerings that will find a market outside of Japan. When it comes to unique products and services, the Japanese have a knack for coming up with offerings that are unlike anything else in the world. And while many of these offerings are popular within Japan, there is a growing belief that some of them could find success outside of Japan's borders.

However, When expanding into new markets, SMEs face many challenges. For example they need to secure funds for the cost of overseas expansion and understand what type or industry will be most profitable in their destination country among other things which is all very time consuming!

,In particular, SMEs have difficulties that they have limits in respect of funds or human resources.
