Such edibles take one to two hours to start producing a euphoric "high," but the impact lasts longer than when smoke or vapor is inhaled. The downsides of edibles, such as unpredictable effects of marijuana after intake, are starting to be resolved because of advances in scientific research and commercial innovation.

However, in several parts of North America, Africa, Australia, Europe, and South America, marijuana is nominally recognized as a drug and is permitted for medical usage, but majority of Middle Eastern and Asian nations continue to forbid it. Consumption, possession, purchase, or sale of commodity is illegal and regarded as a crime in developing nations such as Japan, India, and Korea. As a result, it is anticipated that legal environment for these items will prevent the industry from reaching its full growth potential. In addition, growth is also anticipated to be constrained by adverse effects including cognitive impairment linked to its usage as medicine.
