mentionable factors in this regards is its traits like bacteria resistance, hypo-allergic to the skin, and biocompatibility. The presence of these traits in this surfactant results in its extensive application in personal care products. In addition to that, its features like low thermal conductivity, and low weight have resulted in its increasing use for insulating industrial and agricultural buildings. It is also applicable in commercial buildings for maintaining uniform temperature and minimizing noise levels. Such diverse applications have positively impacted the growth of the market. Another mentionable factor supporting market growth is a continuous emphasis on R&D activities. Silicone surfactants- which are copolymers of polyethers and silicone, have recently been demonstrated to develop the efficiency of microemulsions. Such findings have only been possible due to systematic studies on its phase behavior, which has further developed the knowledge of self-assembly of large molecules. These findings are turning out to be useful to manufacture nanostructured materials, which in turn is expanding the area of operation of the market.
