Pleural effusions are a medical condition in which fluid builds up in the chest cavity around the lungs. This can cause difficulty breathing and other health issues if left untreated. Treatment for pleural effusions depends on the underlying cause but may include thoracentesis, medical therapy, or surgery.

Thoracentesis is a procedure that involves inserting a needle into the chest to remove excess fluid. The doctor may also insert a tube (catheter) into the chest to drain out more fluid over time if needed. Medical therapy usually involves antibiotics to treat any infections causing the effusion and diuretics to reduce excess fluid buildup in the body. Surgery may be an option for some patients with severe cases of pleural effusions or those not responding well to other treatment options.
