Nicotine is a chemical found in tobacco and other plants. It is also the main psychoactive ingredient of cigarettes and other forms of tobacco-containing products that are used for smoking. While nicotine has been consumed by humans for centuries, it has recently become a popular form of recreational drug use.

When consumed, nicotine acts as a stimulant on the human body and produces sensations of pleasure, alertness, and relaxation. The effects of nicotine can be both short-term and long-term depending upon how much is taken in. In the short term, nicotine may cause an increase in heart rate or blood pressure as well as increased alertness; however, this effect typically wears off quickly. Long-term use of nicotine can lead to serious health issues such as cancer and cardiovascular disease due to its carcinogenic properties.
