Arc welding is a process that uses electricity to join two metals together by creating an electrical arc between the metals. It is a fast and efficient way to bond two pieces of metal together. Machinery used in arc welding generally consists of a power supply, cables, electrodes, and ground clamps.

The power supply produces an electric current that passes through the cables and then flows from the electrode to the workpiece. The voltage used for this process usually ranges from 18-40 volts. The electrode is made out of tungsten or steel and allows for better control over the weld joint quality, as well as ensuring that there are no defects in the welded area. Ground clamps help reduce any potential shock hazards by providing a safe route away from any exposed live parts on the equipment.
