In order to maintain maritime security in Miami ports, professional control mechanisms are required.”

Brian Fitzgibbons, VP of USPA

For Art Basel, USPA provided Titanium Service (VIP Security) at various locations, including private events containing A-list attendees at the Yves Saint Laurent gallery and VIP afterparties. Marinas have taken center stage as the Miami International Boat Show approaches in February.

It is not as simple as sending security officers to guard our clients' yachts and marinas. USPA Vice President Brian Fitzgibbons explains that "The advance work we put in takes months of planning and intelligence." He is referring to the preliminary stages of risk assessments, open-source intelligence, and liaison with local law enforcement marine units and the United States Coast Guard.

Fitzgibbons believes that Miami, a major seaport and transportation hub in the state of Florida, poses a major maritime security threat. Various companies also store millions of containers there. The port is one of the largest in the country.

In order to maintain maritime security, professional control mechanisms are required. According to Fitzgibbons, ship security officers are responsible for monitoring suspicious behavior and working closely with local law enforcement authorities. As well as monitoring boats and marinas, they assess cargo before boarding cruise ships.

USPA Nationwide Security has provided superyacht security in Miami and maritime protection throughout the United States, the Caribbean, and parts of Africa since 2005. A team of military veterans and special operators with extensive experience in amphibious operations will be on hand at the Miami International Boat Show.
