Pharmaceutical excipients play a major role in drug formulation and its development. These substances involve substances other than the pharmacologically active drug or prodrug. Pharmaceutical excipients provide the drug with efficient drug delivery to the target site. These molecules prevent the drug from being released too early while assimilation and enhancing the drug efficacy. Some pharmaceutical excipients promote drug integration which boosts drug absorption in the bloodstream.

Moreover, pharmaceutical excipients are also used for drug identification. Pharmaceutical excipients are also used to enhance the drug flavor, which increases patients' compliance, especially children's compliance. Based on the chemical nature of pharmaceutical excipients, these can be obtained from organic and inorganic sources. Organic chemicals include carbohydrates, petrochemicals, oleochemicals, and proteins, among others. Pharmaceutical excipients can act as binders, fillers, diluents, suspension or coating agents, flavoring agents, disintegrants, colorants, lubricants and glidants, sweeteners, and preservatives, among others.

Pharmaceutical excipients possess several functionalities used for different purposes, including binders and adhesives, disintegrants, solubilizers, flavors, emulsifying agents, preservatives, antioxidants, glidants, and chelating agents, among others.

However, the increasing regulatory stringency regarding the approval of drugs and excipients, along with the cost and time-intensive drug development process, are expected to restrain the growth of this market.
