Trauma devices are one of the clinical methods used in trauma care depending on injury severity. Trauma refers to any form of physical injury caused by some external source, such as fractures, dislocations, sprains & strains and burns. These tools are used particularly in long bones for cases like fractures. The other areas covered in the trauma devices include upper extremities and lower extremities such as knee, joint, leg, and spine among others. In addition, there is a shift in trauma devices of polymeric materials for better outcome. These include majorly bone fixation components such as screws and plates.

Trauma as any wound or injury resulting from the application of force or violence to a living body. Under that definition, medical professionals face an exhaustive range of complications. Among the most common are bone fractures or conditions that attack bone tissue, such as tumors. Trauma fixation devices are an essential, frontline treatment for bone fractures and tissue degeneration, and are among the oldest devices still in modern use. Although these devices have been in use for many decades, trauma fixation devices are constantly being iterated. Perhaps the most promising avenue of development is enhancing device engineering using high-performance plastics.
