Wheat proteins are plant-based proteins that are a type of insoluble functional protein. Wheat protein is a mixture of protein isolated from whey that consists of lactalbumin, β -lactoglobulin, serum albumin and immunoglobulins. Wheat protein comprises of two insoluble protein groups namely gliadin and glutenin. Wheat protein is consumed to meet the required amount of protein and amino acids in the body to support muscle development and boost up the immunity.

Rising personal disposable income and growing consumer consciousness toward plant-based nutrition are the major factors fostering the growth of the market. Changing lifestyle, westernization, rising awareness about the availability of both naturally and synthetically produced wheat proteins in the developing economies and rising health consciousness among the population are acting as market growth determinants. Improving distribution channel, rising number of gyms and fitness centres, growing popularity of healthy and high protein powders, ever-rising vegan population and changing tastes and preferences of consumers will further induce growth in the market value.

However, side effects on health associated with high consumption of protein powders will pose a major challenge to the growth of the market. Fluctuations in the prices of raw materials and supply chain disruptions owing to the pandemic will further restrict the scope of growth for the market. Presence of gluten in wheat can cause disease intolerance in humans will also hamper the market growth rate.
