Residents Medical Group is committed to ensuring that every medical graduate gains the requisite skill set, tools, and knowledge to enable them to achieve a medical residency.

Dr. Michael Everest has been instrumental in ensuring that Residents Medical Group achieves its vision. To do this, they employ innovative models comprising residency programs, online video education course Playbook, personalized education plans with expert tutors, zoom sessions, and complimentary assessments.

Now, Residents Medical is hosting Twitter Spaces every Friday to help medical students ace their residency interviews. The addition of this medium will perfectly complement other social media sites such as Facebook, Instagram, and LinkedIn, where Residents Medical Group has been putting out videos and training guides to help medical school graduates and residents.

Since most people are on social media today, using these platforms to help medical graduates and residents makes perfect sense.

Preparatory Programs that can help Residency Applicants Ace USMLE Interviews

Here are preparatory programs medical graduates and residents can expect on Twitter Spaces and which are integral in helping them ace USMLE interviews:

Speech Pathology

When answering interview questions, residency applicants must know how best to present themselves. A candidate could know many things about the medical field but may not know how to communicate effectively.

Some need to exude confidence in what they are doing or saying. As a medic, one must show confidence and composure to put patients and colleagues at ease.

Speech pathology preparatory programs train candidates to improve their pronunciation, accent reduction, confidence, articulation, and intonation.

Interview Preparations

Interview preparation is key to passing USMLE interviews. When it comes to interviews, the first impression is crucial; hence, candidates should not take preparation for granted.

Residents Medical Group has a seasoned team that prepares students on how best to conduct their interviews. With 25 years of experience, they know the questions that interviewers are likely to ask and the answers they are looking for.

Many interviewers will ask for anecdotes that show the graduate's experience or accomplishments.

Residents Medical program directors carry out individualized preparation. They will develop an effective interview style that suits your experience, competencies, and personality.

There are also mock interviews that test what the program director wants them to know about the subject.

Residents Medical Playbook for Residency and Fellowship interviews

For one to advance into residency, one has to interview with the program director successfully. Residents Medical has developed an online education series - Playbook - that shares much information on interview preparation from professional tutors, interview experts, and public speaking coaches.

Current and former program directors have also contributed their views to playbook. Playbook brings together many years of experience of interview experts and tutors in one platform, making it convenient for medical graduates to tap into their knowledge.

The online video courses teach residency applicants how to answer challenging interview questions, avoid common mistakes, and master verbal and non-verbal communication.

One can access playbook anywhere and stream the prep series anytime with an internet connection. Playbook is not just about watching video series; the platform features interactive quizzes, rubrics, transcripts, and streamable mp3 audio.

There will be more course videos to come, so medical school graduates are advised to check for more in the future. Apart from Playbook, Residents Medical has put on training guides and videos on social media platforms such as Twitter and Facebook.

To catch up with Residents Medical Group Twitter Spaces, follow them on Twitter and other social media sites.
