EINPresswire.com/ -- Asking why investors consider a Self-Directed SEP

IRA, American IRA recently released a post on its blog that detailed the SEP-IRA's basics, as well as the advantages to investing in such an account. American IRA, a Self-Directed IRA administration firm based in Asheville, North Carolina, regularly publishes content relating to retirement investing, especially through Self-Directed IRAs. But its recent post served as a highlight on a specific kind of account that is typically only available in specific circumstances.

A SEP-IRA, or a Simplified Employee Pension IRA, is typically available for people who own small businesses, even one-person companies. It can especially be useful in the latter case, as a SEP-IRA may require that all employees receive the same contributions to retirement—a feat which is easy to achieve when there is only one employee, the self-employed individual, to think about. Because of this, a SEP-IRA's high contribution limits are highly appealing to small business owners, allowing them to put aside a lot of retirement money into the account.

American IRA's post opened with a list of the basics in understanding Self-Directed SEP-IRAs. This included what the label "Self-Directed IRA" means, for example, which refers to the style with which the investor manages the account. In a Self-Directed IRA, an investor will work through a Self-Directed IRA custodian who serves as the administrator on the account. Within this account, the investor can then issue buy/sell orders for a wide variety of potential retirement asset classes, such as real estate, precious metals, private companies, private notes and loans, and more.

American IRA also spoke about the advantages of investing in a Self-Directed SEP-IRA, such as the high contribution limits available. The contribution limits rival those of the Self-Directed Solo 401(k), which is another type of account that is available for self-directed IRA investors.
