Every founder's nightmare: 90% of startups completely fail.

Creating a successful tech-startup is hard. In the Middle East, it's traditionally even harder. Startups in the region face many unique challenges that can contribute to failure, including a lack of strong infrastructure for innovation and entrepreneurship, untested markets with uncertain potential for success, and a lack of specialized expertise or resources.

Building a successful tech startup often requires access to specialized knowledge or technology, and in some cases, these resources may be more difficult to come by throughout MENA. As a result, tech startups in the region may face additional challenges as they work to bring their ideas to fruition and achieve success. In some cases, the regulatory environment or the availability of funding and other resources may also be less conducive to the development of new technology-driven businesses. Although recent changes in the UAE are dramatically improving the founder experience, ultimately, the path to success for a tech startup in the Middle East may be complex and unpredictable, and even well-intentioned and well-funded ventures may struggle to overcome the challenges they face.

Our focus is on partnering with founders who have a vision for addressing pressing issues or creating new opportunities within the UAE, and whose products can scale across the Middle East and beyond.”

Help is on the way! Introducing the startup studio concept.

A startup studio is a company that helps entrepreneurs bring new ideas to life by providing a range of resources and support. Startup studios typically work with founders to fund, develop, and scale new companies, and in exchange for this support, they request equity shares in the businesses they help to create.

Startup studios differ from incubators and accelerators in a number of ways. Incubators are typically focused on providing support to early-stage companies, and they may offer a range of paid for services and resources such as office space, mentorship, and access to funding. Accelerators, on the other hand, are typically time-bound and focus on helping companies scale quickly. They can be highly competitive and typically require a team with a working prototype for consideration. Once admitted, they may provide resources such as funding, mentorship, and access to networks in exchange for equity.

Of the three, startup studios are the most involved in the development of new companies at the earliest stages, and provide a more comprehensive range of resources and support. They may also take a more hands-on approach to working with founders, and may be more involved in the day-to-day operations of the companies they help to create. It's noteworthy that founders and a startup studio's interests are aligned in that the studio is only compensated when a business they help create becomes successful and eventually achieves a liquidation event (e.g., acquisition or IPO).

Overall, startup studios offer a unique approach to supporting entrepreneurs and helping them bring an idea from prototype to production to profit. By providing extensive support including idea validation, product development, marketing, mentorship, and access to professional networks, startup studios can help founders navigate the challenges of building a successful business and increase their chances of success.
