Al-Nuaimi has gained a wealth of experience in the film industry, having learned from renowned director Youssef Chahine. He is known for his attention to detail and his ability to bring characters and writing to life on screen.

For "The Egyptian House," Al-Nuaimi carefully chose actors who closely resembled the roles they were playing. The father in the film embodies the characteristics and mannerisms of many Egyptian fathers, while the mother displays the mix of concern and tenderness common among Egyptian mothers. The film follows the lives of a newly married couple and their four children: Ali, Yasmine, Ahmed, and Mona.

The movie delves into the daily lives of an Egyptian family and the conflicts and moments of warmth that occur within the household. It aims to accurately reflect the mood and atmosphere of an Egyptian home and create a sense of familiarity for viewers.

"The Egyptian House" begins with the marriage of a couple who have been in a loving relationship since childhood. After finishing their studies, they get married and have four children. Ali is the eldest and is prone to disputes with his father. Yasmine, the second child, is

The film aims to accurately reflect the mood and warmth of the setting, offering a unique perspective on life in an Egyptian household. Through this approach, the director hopes to create a sense of familiarity and relatability for viewers, making them feel as if they are watching themselves on screen.
