Beyond the obvious financial benefits, there is increasing data to support that working past retirement age may be linked with better health and longevity. Older workers experience better mental and physical health than retirees.

From a business perspective, people are working longer than they have at any time in the previous decade. According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, approximately 40% of people older than 55 were working or actively looking for work in 2014. That number is expected to increase fastest for the oldest segments of the American population through 2024 due in large part to education levels rising and people living longer.

Similarly, there is evidence that mixed-age teams in the workplace are more productive than teams of workers of the same age, so it benefits employers to hire multigenerational employees.

“We are living longer, healthier lives, so it’s no surprise the workforce is getting older,” Evan said. “We scour the web for jobs from employers who understand and value lifetime experience, loyalty, stability, and a strong work ethic.”
