Despite frequent cleaning, pests such as insects, flies, and rodents seem to return in both warm and cold weather, especially in the spring, after waiting out the winter in their homes.

There are many DIY solutions to help prevent these pests from entering buildings and causing irreparable damage. Rodents chewing through drywall, electric wires, furniture, food, and valuables are just a few of the rodent-related concerns of property owners.

Installing door sweeps to keep them out of the house, ensuring food is always kept away and out of reach, keeping trash outside of the house with tight lids, etc., are some specific measures taken by Utah locals.

When it comes to a commercial building, pests are much more than just a disturbance or a nuisance. Along with physical aspects like the structure of a building, products, and inventory, they can cause irreversible damage to the face value of a business. Unwanted pests, rodents, and termites can endanger customers and employees, feast on essential documents, create an uncomfortable working environment, and harm sales and revenue, amongst many other factors. The business world has already seen a downfall due to the work-from-home situation post-pandemic; business owners do not need the additional flies, wasps, or ants marching around to scare away potential customers. Instead, commercial building managers look for commercial pest control Utah-based service providers to help exterminate pests such as flies, termites, bugs, bees, rodents, and more.

Pests are looking for anything they can feed on or new places, nooks, and crannies to inhabit. As the Utah sun shines brighter, the chances of these unwanted critters crawling into homes increase. Inspection of properties is an excellent idea to help diagnose if the building is prone to pests and termites. Further preventative measures include sealing any cracks, holes, and openings in external walls, filling up any burrows created by rodents, sealing door and window gaps, storing food in containers, clearing up crumbs after eating, putting up wires and fences around properties, etc. Though it seems like a doable job for smaller buildings, larger properties usually seek help from professional termite control service providers like [Guardian Pest Control.
