About one in every six people is allergic to cats. Symptoms can vary but may include difficulty breathing, hives, and swelling of the lips and tongue. Cat allergies can be life-threatening if not treated properly; often times medications need to be taken daily for long periods of time. If you are concerned about your cat's allergy, it is important to seek medical advice. It is also possible to keep a cat away from someone who is allergic by using an air purifier or removing all plants and drapes in the room where the cat spends a lot of time. While it may not always be possible, it is important to try to understand why someone has a cat allergy in order to reduce their chances of experiencing an attack. When someone is allergic to a cat, they are allergic to proteins in the saliva of the cat. The symptoms of cat allergy can be mild or severe depending on which part of the body is affected and how often an individual is exposed to the allergen.
