The Minister of Interior of Taiwan presents the Executive Director of the Church of Scientology of Kaohsiung with a certificate acknowledging him as a supervisor in the interfaith association.

The Church of Scientology joins representatives of Buddhism, Taoism, the Roman Catholic Church, Protestant denominations, Islam and other faiths who share the goal of working together to promote a better society.

"Religion is the foundational force for social progress, civilization and stability," said Hsueh. "It is vital that religions work together to uplift our society and to create a better world."

He stressed that religious freedom and tolerance are the cornerstone of a free society. He pointed out that Scientology Founder L. Ron Hubbard placed so much importance on religious freedom that he incorporated the concept into the Creed of the Church of Scientology which states:

"That all men have inalienable rights to their own religious practices and their performance."

“We hope to set a standard for other nations,” said Hsueh, “that religious groups can work together to uplift our society and to create a better world.”
